No such throngs of joyous children ever marched through St. Louis as that which gathered outside the World's Fair grounds St. Louis Day and marched across its plazas. This view shows the wonderful throngs with its inscribed flag and banners describing its loyalty to Christ and the Church. Most of the girls in the column wore white, giving the appearance of a great picnic column.

The children marched fifteen abreast and although the crowd was tremendous, it gave way and allowed the children an unobstructed, although, of course, rather slow progress.

One secures a conception of the size of the crowd by looking across this veritable sea of heads and remembering that he has only one small section of the entire crowded plaza before him.
